"The future of ACG's digital journey is centered on the simple, yet profound, vision of the Connected Member," said Shohreh Abedi, Chief Operations and Technology Officer at ACG. "We want our members to be able to securely access any of our products and services from any digital channel, whenever and wherever they choose."

OpenText Covisint provides the leading IoT and identity platform for digital business transformation. Working with ACG to create a single digital member identity will support ACG's strategic digital program objectives, including improving the overall user experience for the organizations AAA customers.

"Digital identity management, the Internet of Things, and B2C collaboration are at the heart of today's digital revolution where extreme connectivity, automation, and computing are converging," said OpenText Vice Chairman, CEO and CTO Mark J. Barrenechea. "We are thrilled to work with ACG to help them unlock the value of their information and improve their customer experience".

As organizations embrace digital transformation, identity and access management becomes essential for connected experiences. By securely connecting ecosystems of people, systems and things, companies like ACG can enable new service offerings, optimize operations, develop new business models, and ultimately, enable the connected economy.

ACG Chief Information Security Officer Gopal Padinjaruveetil added, "Digital identity is no longer about the username and password. Today, identity is about mastering the relationship between human and machines to provide an outstanding digital user experience. To do so, organizations must provide the appropriate level of access, at the right time and location, and from any device to enable a seamless digital interaction. In today's digital ecosystem, identity awareness and secure access is at the core of managing all interaction, whether human or machine generated.
